The Battle of Fallen Timbers (20 August 1794) was the final battle of the Northwest Indian War, a struggle between Native American tribes affiliated with the Western Confederacy and their British allies, against the nascent United States for control of the Northwest Territory.

Battle of Fallen Timbers—Wikipedia

Battle of Fallen Timbers, (August 20, 1794), military engagement between the United States and the Northwest Indian Confederation on the Maumee River near what is now Toledo, Ohio. After two devastating U.S. losses at the hands of the Northwest Indian Confederation, Maj. Gen. Anthony Wayne took command of the U.S. Army and retaliated against the allied tribes with an expeditionary force of approximately 3,300 men.

As it is stated in the introduction to "Fallen Timbers 1794", the crushing defeat suffered by US Army at Wabash more or less delivered Ohio territory into the hands of local Indians and their allies: British soldiers from neighboring Canada as well as American white renegades (like the infamous Simon Girty).

Fallen Timbers 1794: The US Army's first victory (Campaign) ----

The United States sent an army west in 1791 to confront marauding (as white Americans saw it) Indians. And that army was essentially destroyed at the battle of Wabash. This is the story of a follow up expedition westward, culminating in the battle of Fallen Timbers in 1794. The commander of the later operation was the renowned general, Anthony Wayne.
